MASAL PEREST

Whenever I make a mistake, I tuck it into my pocket and set off in search of a four-leaf clover.

"Every mistake is a chance to begin again," my mother once told me. Then we went clover-picking together.

I haven't found a four-leaf clover yet.
Maybe it will appear once I've collected enough mistakes.

Of course, I don't always recognize a mistake the moment I make one. I've heard that sometimes it takes a little time.

But as time passed, I remembered less and less about my cousin Cici, who lived far away. What if the same thing happened with my mistakes?

Some mistakes, though, I recognize by their smell right away, just like the smell that fills the house when Grandma forgets her carrot cake in the oven.

So perhaps forgetting Cici would be a mistake, too.
