One summer morning, a polar bear named Yoyo set off to go fishing. Even in the summer here, it snows and the weather is always cold. Even when the sun rises the ice never melts because it doesn't get warm enough. In the winter, it snows even more.

Yoyo walked until he found a thin layer of ice.
He made a hole in the ice with his claws.
He put on his sunglasses, set up his chair, and put his fishing rod into the water.

After a few hours, he slung the fish he'd caught over his shoulder and headed home.

When he got home, he couldn't believe his eyes. His house wasn't there. The whole house had turned into water. The books were soaked, the library was a mess, and the house was melting like ice cream.

The weather was not like it used to be. It had started to get warmer, he had even heard other polar bears saying that their houses were starting to melt, but he never thought it would happen to him.
