Nova woke up that morning with a craving for ice cream.
She loved her home and the neighborhood where she lived. But most of all, she loved the ice cream shop in her neighborhood. "I wish summer would come so the ice cream shop could open", she thought.

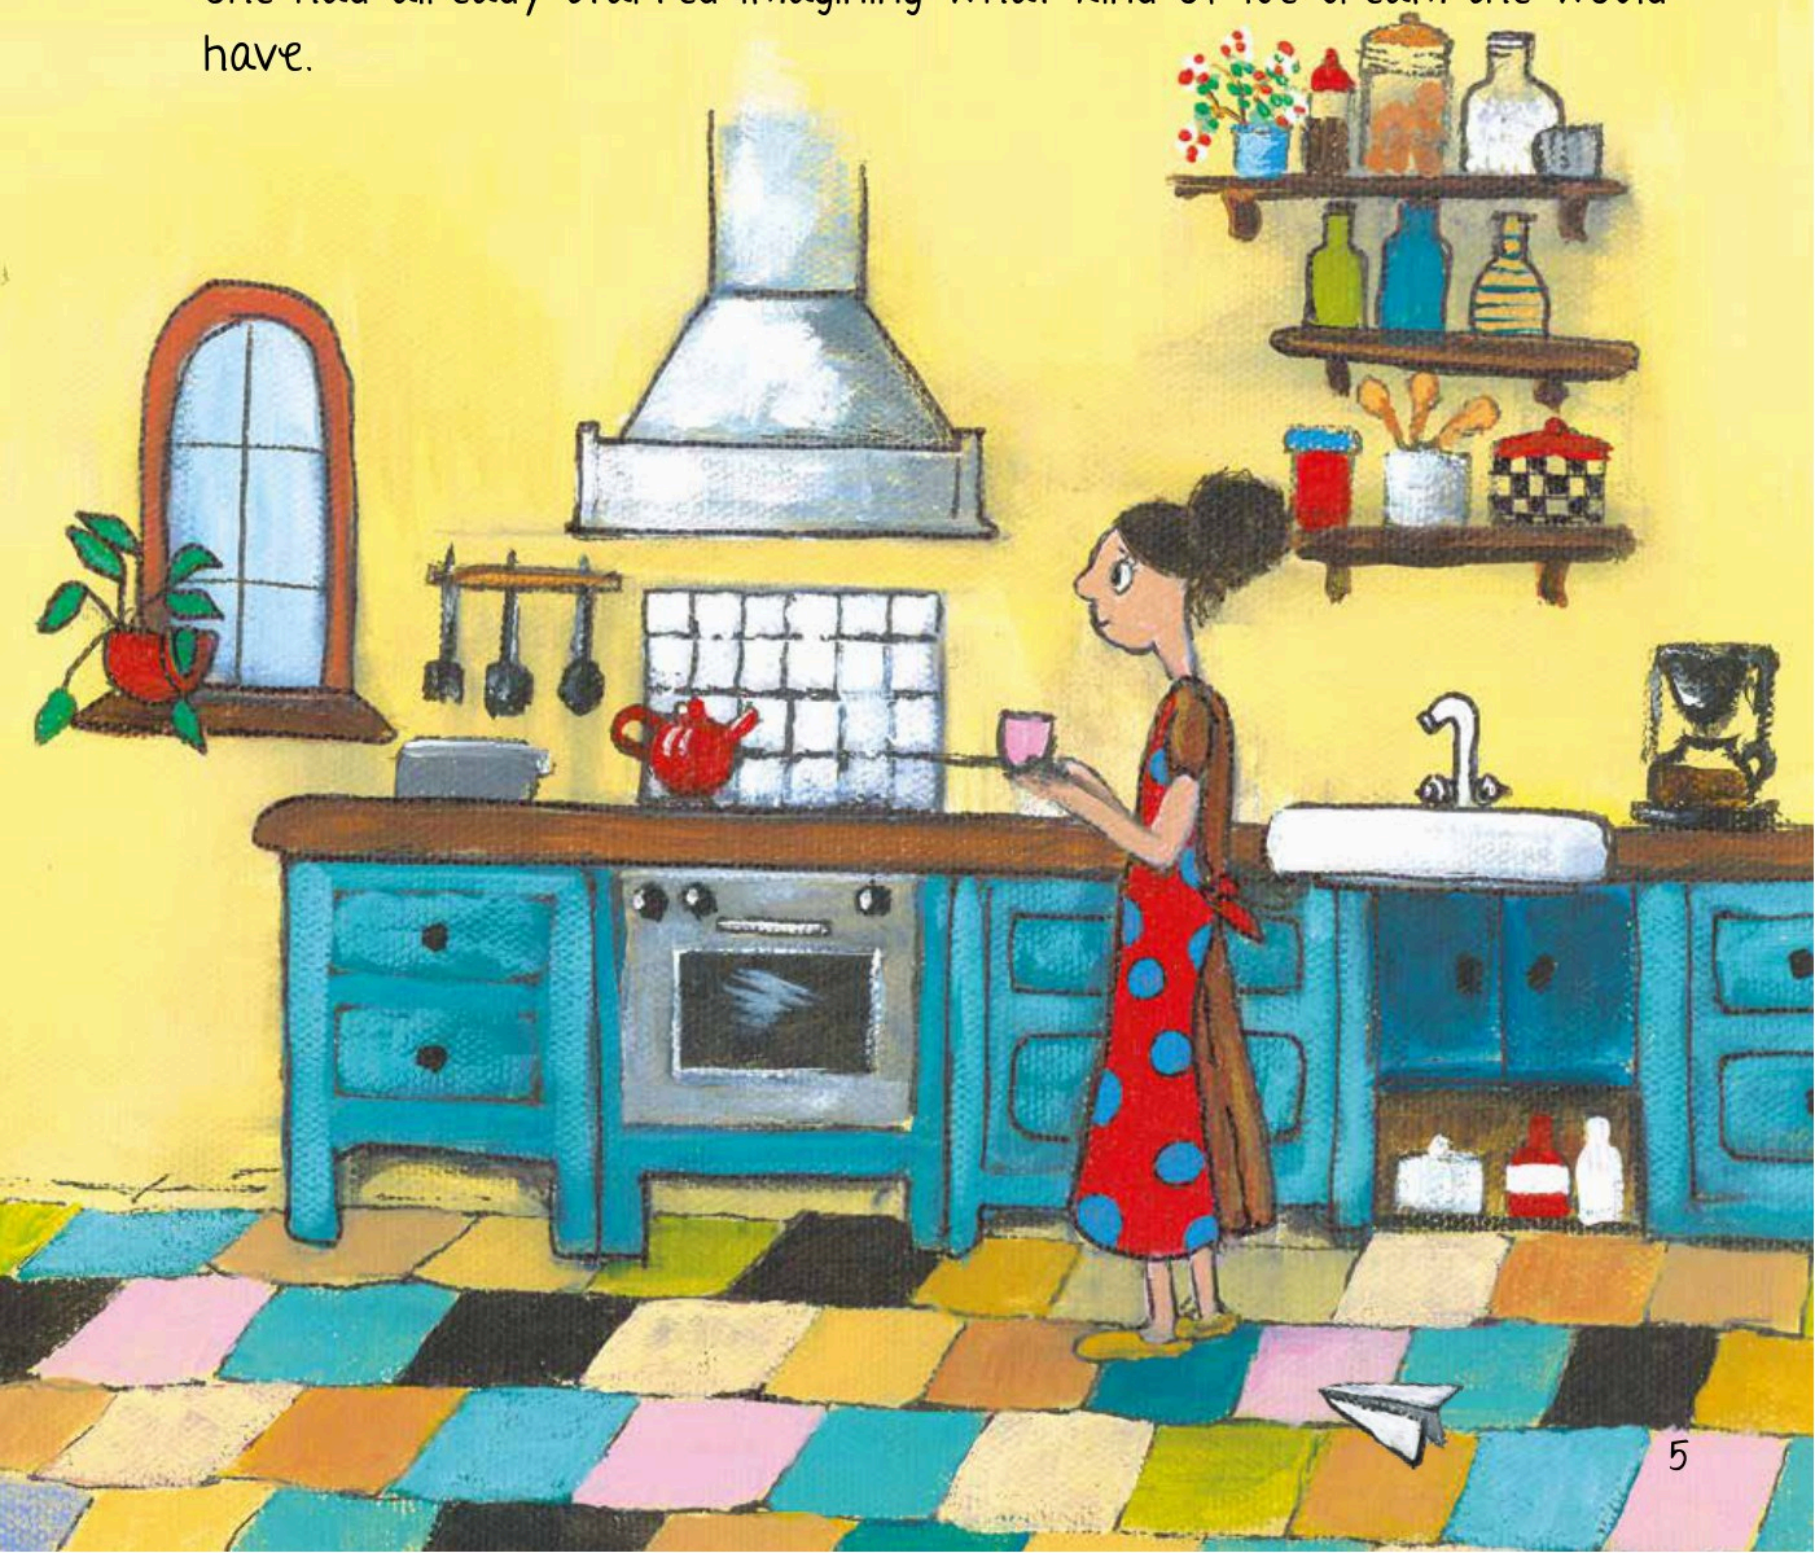

Excitedly, she asked her mother, "Mom, do you think my ice cream shop is open?"

"I'm not sure. We can go and check together after school," said her mother.

Nova was so happy to hear that.

She had already started imagining what kind of ice cream she would have.

As she had promised, Nova's mother picked her up from school.
When they got close to the ice cream shop, Nova gasped in surprise.
"Mom! This isn't my ice cream shop!" she cried, and tears began to roll down her cheeks.
"Yes, I noticed," said her mother. "But I think we should give it a try. Maybe this ice cream is delicious too. What do you think?"

Nova reluctantly walked into the ice cream shop. "Welcome! How would you like your feelings?" the ice cream seller asked. Nova stopped crying and stared at the ice cream seller in surprise. How would you like your feelings? Where had that question come from? Nova was there to eat ice cream. Feelings weren't something you could eat... were they?
