EQUINOX DREAMS

Children,

I am writing to you from a moment when my dreams came true; your dreams are your roadmap to happiness and joy. As long as you keep your map in your heart, the Sun Star will light your way. As long as you believe in yourselves, you will walk the same path as those who believe in you. Just as I have walked. On the path I've walked so far, I've gathered so many beautiful hearts that I'd like to thank everyone

You„ .....

I am glad that we are sharing the same path.

With love and light....

Lukas was one of the storytelling grandfathers of planet Earth. He told children the cheeriest of tales, sometimes making them laugh, sometimes making them think. The children loved him dearly, and he loved them just as much.

Each new day, he would sling his satchel over his shoulder and set off, over streams, hills, and flat plains alike. In his lifetime, he had told so many, so many stories that every child in the world could recite Grandpa Lukas's tales by heart.

But now, Grandpa Lukas had run out of stories. At each gathering, when the children crowded around him in excitement, their smiles would fade the moment he began, and they would start to grumble.

"Again? But you've told us this one before..."

The storytelling grandpa was terribly unhappy. Nothing brought him more joy than meeting with children and seeing the smiles on their faces. As all these thoughts swirled in his mind, he suddenly jumped to his feet and punched the air.

"Of course! That's it!" he cried, bursting into happy laughter.

He would collect the dreams the children had at night and turn them into brand–new stories. Each tale would be woven from a child's dream, so other children could enjoy hearing them too. Without wasting a moment, he shared his idea with everyone. The children loved it. Each one began shouting, "Me first! Me first!" as they hurried to tell him their dreams.

Soon, everyone in the world was curious about Grandpa Lukas's new stories, everyone except one person. Torin, frowning, scowling, and full of anger, appeared before Lukas. Lukas was surprised. "Why are you so upset?" he asked. "You're making a mistake," Torin replied. Lukas frowned in confusion. "Why do you think it's a mistake? My new stories are born from your dreams. I can't imagine anything more wonderful than that."

But then Torin said something that made Lukas fall silent and drift into thought. "I don't dream," Torin said. "And maybe there are other children who don't dream either. What could we possibly tell you?"

"Your wishes..." Lukas said at once. "Tell me your wishes. I'll make stories from those too. And not only will I write stories, I'll try to make each one come true for you." Torin's face began to soften, but then he rested his index finger against his cheek and sank back into thought.

"Night..." he murmured. "Not every child's night is the same! The length of the night isn't equal everywhere on Earth. So the children whose dreams you collect might not be dreaming under the same conditions."
