One hot summer day, at the time of day that the sand was its hottest, the hermit crab, Morti woke up. He wanted to stretch but he couldn't, because his shell had become too small for him.

If he couldn't find a bigger shell, it would be very hard for him to withstand the sun's heat. Morti immediately squished himself into his shell for protection from the sun and set out to find a bigger shell.

He couldn't find a suitable shell on the beach nor in the sea. Being stuck inside his shell was exhausting.

Hermit crabs usually come together to find shells according to their size and change them.

But they don't always find the right shell for themselves.
